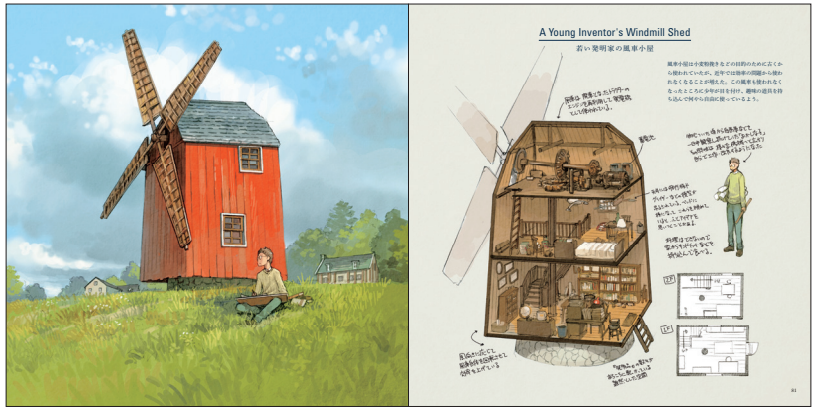
A Girl in the Submerged City Inspired by the architecture in Hong Kong, this scenery is drawn with a concept of post-apocalyptic fiction. The owner of the house is a girl, living alone, looking for her relatives. The electricity is generated from solar panels and the entrance is locked with a security board. In spite of its fantastical story setting, the usual daily lives of human beings are still shown in the illustration.



A Young Inventor's Windmill Shed Inspired by the architecture in the Netherlands, this scenery is drawn as if a young inventor was living there in the 1970s. The owner of the house is a boy, who loves gadgets, machines, and cars. It would be fun to spend a day surrounded by lots of his inventions. Windmills turn by themselves as they catch the wind. The electricity is generated and stored on the 3rd floor.

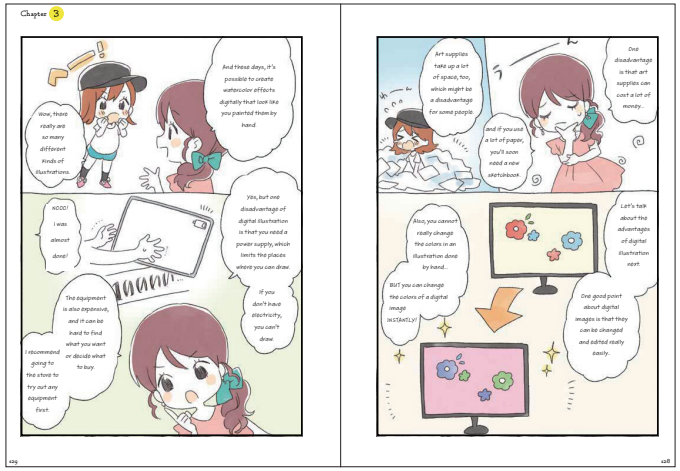
If you draw the hair so that you can see the way it falls and shapes the head, it will look good! This works for short hair, and hair that's pulled up in ponytails, too.One thing that's a little trickier is drawing hair that looks more three-dimensional. It helps to think about how the layers of hair, especially the top and bottom, look different.



Let's learn "How to Use Digital Tools" in chapter 3 and 4. The characters are talking about most frequently asked questions like "Analog & Digital illustration's Pros & Cons", "Tips for Using Digital Art boards & LCD tablets", "Drawing with Smartphones & Tablets". Useful explanations on layers, image resolution, color modes, image formats, and clipping are also included to give beginners a good foundation.
